

Notes about the Real Spirit Bear

The spirit bear is neither a spirit nor a figment of author Ben Mikusben's imagination. It is a real animal. As a matter of fact, National Geographic estimates that there are between 400-1000+ of them in existence.

The spirit bear, or more properly, the Kermode bear, is a subspecies of the American Black Bear that populates the central and northern coast of British Columbia, Canada. The animal's unusual coloration is a result of a recessive gene in the population. On certain islands of the Great Bear Rainforest, as many as one in ten cubs is born with white or cream-colored coats. In other locations, the ratio is one in every 40 to 100. Not an albino, the spirit bear typically has a brown nose and brown eyes. It is neither a polar bear nor one of the blonde brown bears of Alaska's ABC Islands. It is a one-of-a-kind animal with its own trinomial name—Ursus americanus kermodei.

Because of its ghostly appearance, the spirit bear has long been protected and revered by the Canadian First Nations and American Indians who share its territory. Hunting the bear is strictly forbidden in British Columbia, and great care was taken years ago to hide its existence from fur traders. These facts have contributed to its successful and continued survival. In addition to the coastal regions, spirit bear sightings have been documented in the northeast region of British Columbia and as far west as the US state of Minnesota.

The spirit bear, like most black bears, begins life as a half pound cub and grows into a 150-300 pound adult that measures four to six feet from nose tip to tail tip. In predator-free bear territory, it is an omnivore, eating a variety of plants, berries, nuts, fruits, roots, insects, deer, caribou (dead animals), and spawning salmon. Researchers have recently discovered that the spirit bear's white coat gives it an advantage when it goes fishing because it is less visible to its prey.

Except for females with cubs, spirit bears are solitary creatures. They can live for more than 25 years in the wild.

According to Native American legend, the spirit bear's coloration is a reminder of times past. The master of the universe created one white bear for every ten black bears as a reminder of friendship during the ice age when snow, glaciers, and bitter cold engulfed the world. The spirit bear also symbolizes wisdom, peace, and harmony.
